Merchants of Madness- 01,02 September 2018, Antisocial, Hauskhaz- New Delhi

Thanks to Paul and Sabriye, my mentors and the co-founders of Kanthari, I was fortunate to get in touch with Val Resh, the founder of the The Red Door, a creative platform to spread awareness of mental health issues. We could connect easily on our first meeting because of the similarity of the projects that we work for and the cause that we were so passionate about. Before I knew, I was invited to be part of the Merchants of Madness program - an event where madness was celebrated. The event that was held in New Delhi saw famous activists from across the country living with various mental health conditions sharing their experiences about the so called "madness" and how the madness creatively transformed their lives. The event was organised by Bhor Foundation, another NGO working in the field of mental health in collaboration with The Red Door. Let's Live offered its support to this creative and innovative concept, which they wanted to bring to Kerala at some point of time in the future.

Sherin Noordheen's Let's Live aims to address suicide prevention among youngsters

A pillar of support

Let's Live at Kanthari for Monsoon Café session

Suicide enters as an unexpected villain in the lives of many people. As per the latest reports, the general suicide rate in Kerala has come down, however, the suicide rate has increased among youngsters. The reasons may range from mental stress to financial problems, breakups, depression, substance abuse, etc. This is where Let's Live, a non-profit organisation started by Sherin Noordheen which aims at suicide prevention, becomes very relevant. The organisation needs to put off suicide among children and young adults in Kerala.

Sherin, when at 25 was facing depression due to a relationship breakup, had thought of suicide then. Her father had committed suicide when she was six and had greatly affected her life. "As per statistics, if the family has a son committing suicide are more. Fortunately, my friend was there to listen and I overcame it," she says. She is an engineering graduate and was working in the corporate field for 10 years in India and Europe. Later, she came back to India and did PG in journalism. She moved to Delhi with the aim of getting into mainstream journalism, but it was in vain. Then the thought of reaching out to people made her do MSW. "I was making good money but wasn't happy," she adds.

It was while she was in Delhi that she went into depression again and had to get it clinically diagnosed. The psychiatrist asked her to master 'Life Skills' and she says it was the first time she came across that term. "These are the skills we need to have a happy and healthy life. We need to master how to handle stress, understand what's peace and and cope with examination stress. It was a turning point in my life. I started mastering these skills through reading, travelling, etc. It really healed me. For society, happiness is all about getting a good degree, job, marriage and children. There's more to it. Helping others from my experiences is what I started doing."

That is when the thought of starting an NGO came to her mind. But she was not aware of the workings of an NGO. "On completion of the MSW, I had my practicals at Thiruvananthapuram Mental Health Centre. That's where I came to know how an institution is run and what the challenges are. Suicide prevention came naturally to my mind as I had such a case in my family and personally had such thoughts so many times. I thought to focus on preventing young adults. Suicide is a very impulsive thing. It can happen due to breakups, depression, etc. If someone is there to listen or help out, this can be easily prevented," she explains.

That led to the launch of her non-profit organisation Let's Live earlier this year. She underwent a 7-month course at Kanthari on how an NGO is run. "The plan is having early intervention to prevent suicide. Someone with suicidal thoughts should have the space to express his/her thoughts and there the listener shouldn't be judgmental," says Sherin.

She's currently getting ready to launch her project 'Halfway Café'. "It's a space for people undergoing emotional and mental trauma. They can come and express themselves freely, without getting judged. They can talk, draw, sit alone, etc. over a cup of coffee."

Let's Live conducted an open discussion at The Reading Room on September 9, which is observed as World Suicide Prevention Day.

"Breaking the Myths was all about the myths around suicide. How
